

To remove the Morse Code requirement for an Amateur Radio license serves no useful purpose.

The Morse code is the one area of the examination process where applicants for Amateur Licenses must prove they have made the effort to pass the test.

The written examinations are passed primarily through memorization of questions and answers just as they appear on the tests.

If the proponents of removing the Morse Code from the tests believe this will generate a large number of new candidates for Amateur Licensing, they're going to be vastly disappointed.

Competition from the Internet and a plethora of new electronic devices including cellphones will be unchanged by your plan to destroy Morse code testing.

Please leave the Morse testing requirement in place.

I'd like to know how many FCC Commissioners know the Morse code?
